Overview of Minor

1 Brief outline of the minor

This minor provides a basic grounding in the theories, issues and methodologies which are central to the study of Politics, focusing throughout on how we can conceptualise and explain political decisions, events and actions, and how political power is used by political actors to shape outcomes. The Minor provides for the analysis of political theories, political systems and institutions, political participation, and public policy, examination of which will cumulatively develop an understanding of the complexity and contested nature of politics.

This minor is not available to students on BSc International Relations or BSc Politics & International Relations

2 Learning and teaching

The learning and teaching methods concentrate on relating theory to practice, developing analytical abilities and skills, and examining the impact of actions in historical and contemporary contexts. Lectures are complemented by seminars and group activities, some employing simulation exercises and case study analysis.

3 Assessment

Assessment methods allow students to demonstrate achievement of the learning outcomes by prioritising analysis of complex material that is subject to multiple reasonable interpretations. Essays and group projects allow students to develop and present cases and arguments, focusing on the ultimately contested nature of explanations in the study of Politics.

Structure of Minor

1 Typical content

The minor in Politics introduces and develops your understanding of political events and actions, as well as the competing traditions of enquiry and analysis that help scholars explore this field of study. In understanding and explaining political phenomena, we must accept that cultural, historical, and practical circumstances will strongly influence not only interpretations of events, but also the reasons and evidence that will support any given conclusion. Politics broadly concerns those things about which people disagree – about decisions and who makes them, use of scarce resources, agendas for action – and political analysis involves the exploration and impact of contested ideas about what a 'good' political system should look like. This requires the study and analysis of political power, a focus which underpins all political analysis, in terms of who has power in political terms (and who does not), how that power is used, and to what effect for society and its various members. Specific avenues of inquiry in the study of the Politics Minor may include, for example: political theory, democratic systems, political participation, political institutions, regional and national politics, and public policy.
